PARTED.

WRITTEN FOR THE NEW YORK CLIPPER,
BY O. R. BEERS.

It was the fairest rose that grew
Among the thrifty leaf and thorn,
Kissed by the pearly drops of dew
That wooed its blushing cheek at morn.

And so, its stem—broken in twain—
Did from the dewy kiss depart,
And by a loving hand was laid
To fade above a pulseless heart.

Thus do our joys day after day
Slip silently our clasp, unseen;
But far across the voiceless way
Death stands—our joys and us between.

A LITTLE EPISODE.

WRITTEN FOR THE NEW YORK CLIPPER,
BY ETTIE ROGERS.

"Mine is a dual nature. I am half sinner and half saint, I think, for my conscience is forever warring against my fancies and follies. Ah, why was I given this fatal tendency to desire and do what is not right and best? And why did I allow this fateful drama of sweetest passion to conquer my compunctions?"

Daphne St. Cyr was pale with intensest feeling and her eyes glistened with bravely repressed tears. She was much too proud to make tears a means of any sort of appeal or defense or conquest, and much too sensitive not to shrink from appearing otherwise, however inclined she might be to indulge in bitterest weeping.

She made a magnificent living picture standing there in the open window, framed in by silken curtain drapery of silver and blue, all her exquisite dress silvery silk and cloudy tulle, with pearls about her neck and blue violets on her breast and in her splendid hair.

Without were the white moonlight, the deep green shadows of noble trees, the pale glimmer of roses and lilies, and all the dusky, odorless glory of a delicious Summer night. Inside were the elegantly luxurious room, the lovely woman with her picturesque dress, her superb figure and enchanting face; inside were all the potent elements of a sorrowful and fascinating drama. There stood the sweetheart, anxious undoubted, but much too enthralled by delectable illusions to yield her soul to the penitence that conscience urged—the cold, mad moonshine glittering in a ghostly halo about her fair, drooping head—her pretty, soft hands surrendered to the passionate clasp of the lover, who regarded her with a troubled and adoring gaze.

"Why did I yield to this pleasant folly?" she asked mournfully.

"Because you could not help yielding," was the quick response in the masterful, mesmeric tones that had so lured and enslaved her. "You were created for love, my sweet dear. Looking upon you, I imagine you must be very like that fair being who inspired Moore's charming lines:

Love was to her impassioned soul,
Not as to others, a mere part
Of her existence, but the whole—
The very life-breath of her heart.

And again I fancy you must resemble the ideal of Byron's stanza:

The world was not for her, nor the world's art
For one so passionate as Sappho's heart;
Love was born with her, in her, so intense,
It was her very spirit, not a sense.

You were created to love and be loved, my Daphne. No one has ever loved you as I do; no one will ever so fondly love you again. You were lonely and unhappy before I came, were you not?"

"Oh, yes, oh, yes," she acknowledged simply. "You know that I was, Kenneth."

For a moment a shifting moonbeam lighted his face—that brune face, so handsome and persuasive—and upon it was a look of impatient rebellion.

"A kinder fate would have sent me to you before they married you to that servile, unappreciative —" He stopped, awed for an instant by her disapproving glance. Then he continued decisively: "I must have my say, my poor girl, and surely I can do no wrong in saying what we all know and what you so keenly realize. I aver again that a kinder fate would have sent me to you before an erring brother wedded his child-sister to a comrade of his carousals, for the most despicable of all selfish motives. They gave you not a husband, but a master. They made you not a wife, but a nurse—the unthanked nurse of a man whose gray hairs are no honor to his brainless pate, who wasted the fire and vigor of his youth in dissipation that, had he ever had a heart, would have left that organ ashes or stone. As it is, having sought and done evil all his life, he has no faith in goodness. He is suspicious because he has eternally deserved suspicion. He is conscious of no distinction between license and liberty, and he fancies that to keep a wife true he must hold her in a bondage more galling than that of a galley-slave. I have seen and understood it all, my darling, and my compassion for you is as infinite as my love is measureless. You are pale and cold as the moonlight, Daphne. Why do you shiver and turn from me? That is inconsistent, is it not? For have you not lain in my arms 'for a day and a night,' and vowed that you loved me? I want you to come with me as my own and mine only. Your master cannot blame you for breaking those bonds that, although man has made them legal, our Creator and our own nature protest against as cruel and unholy. Do you wish me to leave you, oh, my poor Daphne? Have you determined to resume that most unrighteous allegiance?"

"No, no, Kenneth, no!" she replied most earnestly. "I abhor a sham. I hold that the disloyal wife who will affect fidelity is doubly dishonored. Then resume conjugal relations with him whose cruelty has driven me to this folly. I had rather confess my faithlessness, and let him strike me dead at his feet."

"And death is your doom, my conscientious beauty!" cried someone in coarse accents, as the door was violently pushed back and an apparition of vulgarity and brutality strode across the moonlighted room.

Bestial, bloated and besotted, Daphne's husband uplifted his arm for a cowardly blow, but she faced him with a look on her beautiful face he had never seen before. It was the look that might have distinguished Boadicea standing, in her desperate and sublime defiance, upright in her chariot before a brutish and murderous soldiery.

"You would have been more manly," she said quietly, "to have made death my sudden and painless doom on the day you married me, and to have omitted the slow, deadly torture you have inflicted upon me for years."

Perhaps the despairing pathos of her sweet, fearless voice aroused something humane in his gross feelings, for he instantly changed his threatening gesture to assume an attitude that would have been almost tragic had it not been so affectedly grotesque. But his mawkish supplications and apologies were made vainly. Daphne listened to his pleadings and excuses and promises just as politely as she had often listened before, but not with the old willingness to believe implicitly, defying her better judgment for the sweet sake of precious duty, as she had once tried to do. He confessed, with a great semblance of grief and contriteness, that his behavior had been blamable. He pleaded for pardon and promised much. But Daphne stood before him as white and impressive as a statue. When he had at last ended his paltry and senseless plea, she answered serenely and significantly:

"I am fully aware of the precise value of your excuses and your vows, and I refuse absolutely to ever return to you as a wife," she said in firmest tones. "You have forced me across a Rubicon, and I—well, possibly you may have an inkling of the meaning of the simile—I have burned my bridges behind me. In me you have no longer a sultana, an odalisque or serf."

He regarded her for a single second with a hateful stare of wrath and incredulity. He could not quite understand how the gentle nature he had kept leashed so long could really rebel against his own authority.

"I suppose you mean you have taken a lover," he hissed venomously. "Is this the man who no doubt fancies he has obtained a prize?"

This concluding query was succeeded by a volley of vituperation that obviously revealed the vile nature of him who uttered it.

Kenneth Douglas, despite his error, was much too manly to assume an equivocal defense. He was pallid with resentment, yet meant to act judiciously. But nevertheless the situation was decidedly embarrassing.

There was a long, portentous silence, broken at last by the sharp clicking of a weapon. Daphne leaned against the casement as if alarmed, and moaned faintly. Another report succeeded, and Daphne's husband stumbled and fell, bathed with the gushing blood of a fatal wound. Kenneth Douglas turned towards the motionless figure by the window. The delicate hands were tightly clutched in the silken curtains, and the form he clasped in the moonlight was lifeless.

The tragedy of the fair Summer-night had ended in an episode that is less common than might be supposed.

TWO SONNETS—NEW ENGLAND'S POETS.

WRITTEN FOR THE NEW YORK CLIPPER,
BY LEONARD WHEELER.

I.—LONGFELLOW.

Love's weeping raptures swell with every line
Which thou, dear poet of the heart, hast penned;
The rainy twilight of the year's last end
Are shadowed in those tearful songs of thine;
Thy music is the sobbing of the pine,
And sea-gulls' crying, which harmonious blend
With ocean moaning, sorrow's heart to rend,
And chasten grief to something more divine!
Thy realm is in the hearthstone's cheery light,
Thy throne our hearts, thou laureled, kingly guest,
Whose homestead beams in heaven's loving eyes;
Thy poetry is like a cloudless night,
Shedding impressive peace upon the breast,
Quiet and beautiful as starry skies.

II.—WHITTIER.

A youth whose heart rebelled 'gainst tyranny,
A man whose soul abhorred a good or evil,
The poet armed with one great gift of God
To scourge with fire his land's arch enemy.
Arrayed against unholiness and slavery,
He struck with those inspired ones who trod
Through death's dark path to redeem the sod
From chains, and re-establish Liberty!
Thy comrades have gone down in the dust
And silence, but their deeds shall live in song
While shine the moon and stars and deathless sun!
O Whittier, the tender and the just,
Brave scorner of inhuman craft and wrong,
True bard and Liberty's high-priest in one!

The unfavorable news contained in Fortoto's dispatch caused every hope to crumble at once. That scaffolding of crime, so skillfully constructed, caved in at its base. Noridet saw arise before him the image of chastisement, henceforth inevitable, and through his overturned brain rolled this terrible thought:

"I have slain Monsieur Lugos; but his intended lives, and Fortoto has not succeeded in robbing him of the proofs."

He had still courage adequate to put a good face upon the matter, and to pay the postman handsomely.

"Cause the horses to be harnessed immediately, I pray you," said he to the chief stableman. "The dispatch I have received obliges my presence in Paris as early as possible."

In his trouble he had not forgotten that prudence dictated his leaving Monville without loss of time. The corpse might be discovered upon the beach from one instant to another; it would not fail to be carried to the chateau, and he felt that he lacked fortitude to be present at the scene which must ensue. Besides, he was in haste to have an explanation of the transaction in the Rue Vanneau. In Fortoto's dispatch was an enigmatical sentence. The mulatto said: "Harvests impossible." Did this ambiguous style conceal treason? Noridet began so to believe, and in any case desired to know promptly the course he must take, inasmuch as, among all the dangers menacing him, the detection of his accomplice was the most serious. Should Fortoto have ranged himself among his enemies and surrendered the secret of the attempt to seize the documents, all was lost, and the culprit should evade apprehension as soon as possible. Thus thought he at the moment. The day would suffice to obtain avowals from the negro's son and his punishment, and on the morrow Noridet, avenged, could embark with his gold and valuables for the protective soil of England.

Twenty minutes after the arrival of the disastrous dispatch he rattled over the road to Dieppe, driving a fast-going English trotter, which deposited him within an hour at the railroad station, where another annoyance awaited the traveler. There was no train before half-past twelve, and Noridet was condemned to lose precious time at Dieppe. For the instant he contemplated ordering a special train, but he reflected that this extraordinary haste might be remarked, and it was to his interest not to attract attention. He consequently was compelled to subdue his impatience through loitering around the town, and with the instinct characterizing murderers he lounged towards that quarter where he was the most likely to overhear allusions to his crime. After depositing his baggage and sending back his vehicle, he walked towards the Faubourg du Pollet and reached the jetty. He was aware that all the fishermen frequenting the beaches of Puits and Monville re-entered Dieppe by this road, and he said to himself that, should Lugos' corpse have been found at the bottom of the cliff, news of that incident would be current among them. The hour was well selected, for the rising tide had driven off the fishwives, and Noridet encountered this industrious population of the port at the moment of its return, basket upon arm and not upon shoulder. These women walked in small groups, chattering merrily among themselves. Noridet stopped unostentatiously as they passed along and endeavored to catch drifts of their conversation, but he overheard nothing beyond lamentations as to the scarcity of fish and gross pleasantries seasoned by a Normandy accent. They offered him for sale prawns, and one of the fishwives assured him that hers came from the rocks at Monville, where the finest are gathered. Yet of the murder not a word. This silence astonished and reassured Noridet. Since the women, natural-born gossips, did not allude to a body picked up on the beach, the Count's disappearance would therefore remain inexplicable for some days at least. This good fortune assured the culprit a respite, of which he trusted to profit, and he returned in good spirits to the railroad station. He reached it long before the hour for departure, and had been installed for a length of time in a first-class carriage when the locomotive whistled for departure. It was a mixed train, a majority of passengers taking the second-class, while Noridet was alone in his compartment. The physical and moral excitements of the previous night commenced producing their effect. He was terribly fatigued. The manoeuvres he contemplated to force Fortoto to confess kept him awake for some time, but at last need for slumber prevailed, and half an hour after leaving Dieppe he fell into a doze. Gradually his slumber grew so heavy that the noise of opening and closing the carriage doors did not in the least disturb him. The train had entered the depot at Rouen before he opened his eyes. His awakening was sufficiently complete for him to take passing notice of all occurring around him. He vaguely perceived that a place had been occupied in the carriage, and, without paying attention to the newcomer, who had doubtless entered at some intermediate station, he stretched himself out upon his bench and was about relapsing into sleep, when he imagined that the traveler opposite saluted him. He rubbed his eyes, and looked at him with greater attention. At first he thought himself deceived; but after some moments of scrutiny he arose as if struck by an electric shock, and remained surprised and mute in front of this unexpected fellow-voyager. Bernard was before him—humble Monsieur Bernard, smiling timidly, and repeating that obsequious salutation which had attracted his attention. This presence appeared wonderful, and the murderer firmly believed that all had been discovered, and that the intended was following him in the railcars to cause his arrest. His first inspiration was to leap from the carriage and endeavor to lose himself among the crowd thronging the depot platform, but at the moment of his rising Monsieur Bernard spoke to him:

"I beg the gentleman's pardon," said he in a kindly tone of voice, "for allowing myself to occupy the same compartment with him. I took the second-class at Dieppe, but was told that the omnibus train would only arrive at Paris by seven o'clock. At Malawny I paid a supplementary price to continue by express, and the employees made me enter here. But, had I known the gentleman to have been in this carriage—"

The intended might have long continued in this strain, but Noridet did not listen to him. He meditated escape, and his hand was seeking the external handle of the door.

"Don't let the gentleman derange himself," resumed Bernard; "I will get out and find a place elsewhere."

He made a movement to go out. An idea crossed Noridet's mind.

"Why so, my friend?" he said with animation. "On the contrary, do me the favor of remaining. I don't like to travel alone, and you will keep me company."

"The gentleman is too good," rejoined the intended with respectful embarrassment.

"No; I love to talk, that's all. Besides, are you not in the service of the Count d'Alcamo?"

"Yes, sir, for over ten years."

"Well, I much admire your master," resumed Noridet with rare impertinence, "and I know that he treats you rather as a friend than a domestic. We will talk—parbleu! we will talk about him, should you desire."

After having thrown out this commonplace remark as a trial balloon, Noridet glanced upon Monsieur Bernard. But the placid and honest face of the intended expressed neither indignation nor surprise. He preserved wholly the demeanor of a subaltern feeling flattered at his superior's condescension.

"Decidedly, he does not know of his death," thought Noridet.

The stopping time at Rouen was very short, and the train resumed its progress without change in the travelers' positions. No one ascended into their compartment; and as their carriage had been hitched to the express, it was probable that they would remain its sole occupants until arrival at Paris. This tele-a-tele was peculiarly acceptable to Noridet, who experienced a deal of trouble in placing credence in Bernard's sincerity, and desired to test it to the bottom. He commenced the attack instantly upon clearing the Rouen tunnels to enter upon the charming valley of the Seine.

"I believe that the Count designs remaining several days at Monville," he said with an air of indifference.

"The Count has changed his intention," very naturally replied the intended. "Yesterday he gave me orders to prepare his apartments, and I expect his arrival to-morrow in Paris."

"Then he changed his mind at a late hour, for upon my return from Billville he proposed a ride with him in the forest."

"The Count summoned me about midnight."

Noridet could not smother a nervous movement.

"You have not seen your master this morning?" he inquired after a silence.

"Oh! no, sir. I left the chateau at nine o'clock, and the Count had not as yet arisen."

Noridet meditated deeply. Bernard's answers corresponded with those of the prawn-fishers. If the body had not been found at low tide, the intended could very well leave Monville without suspecting his master's death.

"Nothing to fear to-day," thought the murderer; "but to-morrow Lugos should arrive at Paris. This man will await him a day, or perhaps two days. Then he will return to Monville, and, learning of the Count's disappearance, will denounce me, as he has the proofs."

"Do you know," he asked abruptly, "how many stations we have before arrival at Paris?"

"Only one, sir."

"Where is that?"

"At Mantes."

Noridet knew the line, and remembered that the train, before stopping for the last time, should pass through the long tunnel of Rolleboise. It was a passage of from four to five minutes in complete darkness.

"We are alone," thought the scoundrel, "and I am stronger than he."

He huddled in a corner of the carriage and appeared to doze, but his half-opened eyes followed attentively the progress of the train. An hour thus passed. The road skirted the base of the heights overlooking the flow of the Seine, and entered into a series of cuttings hewn through the solid rock. Noridet turned his head slightly, and perceived that Bernard was asleep. He arose noiselessly, and, leaning over through the opening in the carriage door, raised the catch fastening it at the bottom. Then he looked upon his traveling companion. The intended had not stirred, and the regularity of breathing showed his sleep to be untroubled. The locomotive whistled to announce its entry into the tunnel. Noridet again put his head through the window and saw, a hundred yards beyond, the yawning mouth of the subterranean passage. Daylight suddenly diminished, a deep sound was re-echoed from the high walls of the cutting, and the train engulfed itself within the tunnel.

"It is now time," muttered Noridet between his teeth. He arose without noise, and threw open the carriage door. The sleeper had heard nothing. He had quartered himself in a corner, his legs extended, his head thrown back, and the noise of the train rolling beneath a sonorous vault had evoked no movement.

"You will awake nevermore," said Noridet, seizing upon his throat.

The struggle was short. The unfortunate intended, suffocated by an energetic compression, mechanically extended his arms for defense; but his adversary bent a knee upon his breast and pressed upon him his full weight. Bernard combated convulsively; he attempted to cry; he even succeeded in repelling Noridet. But soon breath failed him; his clenched hands opened, and his limbs stiffened. He lost consciousness, and lay inert upon the carriage cushions. The murderer seized him by the waist to cast him through the door, and then a singular scene took place. The man whom he had strangled in a few seconds Noridet was unable to move. He endeavored to raise up the body, but the body fell back heavily. He dragged it towards him violently, and the body resisted as if death had restored it strength. It was a battle with a corpse. Then came a moment when Noridet, seized with rage and fear, fell exhausted upon his seat. He gazed upon his victim with haggard eyes, and felt himself glued to the bench by a superstitious terror. It appeared to him impossible to place a hand upon the man he had slain, as the dead would arise and denounce him as an assassin. The train rolled onward with frightful rapidity, and the few lanterns illuminating the tunnel passed by as meteors. Soon an indistinct light faintly gleamed upon the dark walls.

"Daylight!" exclaimed Noridet. "We are emerging, and I am lost!"

Imminence of danger recalled him to himself, and bestowed upon him ferocious courage to complete his work. He seized the corpse by the feet, dragged it with infinite trouble to the door, and cast it out upon the road.

It was time. The light augmented rapidly, and twenty seconds afterwards the train emerged into a cutting open to the skies. Noridet succeeded in reclosing the door when the locomotive had passed the tunnel.

This final effort exhausted him. He remained seated in the attitude of a man overwhelmed by fatigue, without even strength for thought. Had he been seen in this state, his crime would have been suspected; but he was alone, and the express was annihilating space. Each turn of the wheel brought him nearer to immunity. The railway carriage afforded no trace of a struggle—no blood, no rent in the cushions, and not a vestige of torn garments. The murderer had not even a scratch, and his traveling dress remained undisturbed. In this compartment there was merely a fashionable young man traveling first-class. No one would have hesitated to seat himself at the side of this gentleman of superior appearance.

At Mantes, however, Noridet suffered ten minutes of agony. The sight of a gendarme walking leisurely in front of the cars caused him to pale and shiver. The telegraph had had time to be set in action to communicate intelligence of the incident, and the train might be searched. But nothing occurred to justify his fears, and the train dashed anew towards Paris under full head of steam, while the peaceable station of Mantes remained undisturbed by a hunt after a criminal. Noridet this time believed himself to be saved.

"In an hour," thought he, "I will be confounded amid the crowd on the boulevards, and no one will suspect my having journeyed from Dieppe by the express."

He reasoned correctly, for it was next to impossible to discover a connecting link between so obscure an individual as Monsieur Bernard and the happy possessor of many millions. Lugos alone could have advanced a motive for the crime, but he was dead. Remorse evaporated along with fear, and a ferocious joy gradually pervaded Noridet's heart. For the first time in many days he felt himself to be free. Those weighing upon his life were no longer to be feared, and he could say:

"The future is mine."

A sole uneasiness still troubled this dearly-purchased tranquillity. Fortoto knew but half of a secret, but that half of a secret he could betray. His conduct, moreover, was inexplicable, and Noridet was firmly determined to wrestle with the sole danger menacing him. The railroad incident in no wise changed his projects. Monsieur Bernard might not reappear at the Rue Vanneau, but the accusing papers ever slept beneath the force since Fortoto renounced seizure of them. Noridet was intent upon interrogating the mulatto without the sacrifice of a moment in time. He calculated upon two hours being sufficient to find him, to catechise him and force from him the truth. Night remained to recompense the abandoned enterprise.

"If needs be, I will go alone to the Rue Vanneau," said Noridet in a low tone the instant the train arrived at the Paris depot. And he added with a nervous laugh:

"We are never better served than by ourselves."

When Noridet trod the pavement of the Rue d'Amsterdam, he experienced the sensation of a shipwrecked man touching land after a long swim. Not to be delayed, he had left his baggage at the depot, and, leaping into a hack, he ordered the coachman to drive to the Boulevard Bourdon.

Fortoto, despite his new fortune, had preserved his modest domicile at the a la Renommée des Frères. While he prosecuted his two trades of mountebank and figurant, he had adopted the quarter of the Bastille and discovered at the little riverside restaurant an economical hospitality. There he hired a room beneath the eaves and ate his meals in the kitchen. He assuredly would have been able with the five hundred francs advanced by Noridet to have lodged in better style, but he preserved the instinct of his old profession of policeman, and he knew that the better to conceal himself he must refrain from changing in anywise his ordinary habits of life. His newly-acquired opulence modified nothing but his costume. He had joyously consigned his mountebank's attire to a drawer in his worm-eaten commode, and went out daily in his brand-new clothes; but he returned regularly at the hour of repast and faithfully slept beneath Pere Pitois' roof. It was there Noridet had addressed the dispatch bidding him commence the harvests. He believed it, consequently, to be a certainty to find Fortoto at this place, and he resolved to wait there for him, were he not in at the time of calling. He desired positively to see him that evening.

As in his first journey to the Pont d'Austerlitz, Noridet halted his carriage at the corner of the Boulevard and walked to the restaurant where he had maintained that conversation with Fortoto which became a starting-point for so many serious occurrences. The little garden was, as usual, deserted, and the house seemed poorly frequented. Noridet had some trouble in inducing the white-aproned waiter, who was fishing with a line at the quay, to come in answer to him. The lover of gudgeons decided, nevertheless, to suspend his occupation upon remarking the elegant attire of the hurried gentleman.

"I desire to speak with Monsieur Fortoto," quoth Noridet, without giving him time to call off the customary bill of fare.

The waiter gazed upon the visitor in astonishment. Evidently it surpassed his comprehension that so well-dressed an individual could have anything to say to the ex-dealer in Bengal powder.

"Fortoto, the artist?" he asked after some hesitation.

"The very same. I wish to see him as soon as possible."

"Oh! monsieur is probably a manager, and monsieur comes with an engagement. It is very unlucky."

"How so?" said Noridet, without replying to the white-aproned gentleman's conjectures.

"Heavens! yes. Fortoto would have asked nothing better. At present he is out of work. But it is real bad luck. He no longer lives here."

"Since when?"

"Since yesterday. He did not return yesterday, but he was here this morning with such a sheepish air. He made a package of his traps, paid the boss and was off."

"But he left his address?"

"He left nothing at all. He only said he was going to leave Paris."

"Hence you cannot tell me where I can find him?" inquired Noridet, who had turned pale at this disastrous information.

"Certainly not, and I even fear that we shall never see him again about here; for, it is not for me to say it, he had the look of a man who had been up to some dirty business. Does monsieur desire beer, absinthe, vermouth—"

"I want nothing," responded Noridet curtly, throwing a silver coin to the waiter.

He strided hastily out of the garden, rejoined his vehicle and gave orders to be driven to his own house in the Rue de Helder. He longed to be alone to reflect upon this new incident overturning all his projects. Fortunately, the driver had a good horse, and in twenty minutes Noridet was landed at his own door. The porter, recognizing the opulent tenant, came out of his lodge to receive him with boundless salutations.

"Here is a very pressing letter brought here for you, sir," said he, presenting a common envelope.

Noridet glanced at the superscription, and was inspired by a presentiment deciding him to break open the seal without taking time to ascend to his rooms. To his great surprise a small package of bankbills appeared, and he first imagined it an epistle from his notary; but beneath the notes was a letter, at the end of which Fortoto's signature struck his eyes. It ran as follows:

MONSIEUR JULES: Pardon me, for I am unfortunate. I would have done what I promised you, but reasons which I cannot tell you prevent me from continuing to serve you. But if I leave you, perhaps forever, at least I am neither a traitor nor an ingrate, for I will say nothing to anybody and will never forget your kindness. I send back four hundred francs of the five hundred you gave me. I have spent a hundred, which I hope to be able to return you soon, and I remain, while praying you again to have no further use for me, your very humble and grateful Fortoto.

"The unfortunate man has become crazy," murmured Noridet in consternation.

CHAPTER XII.

During the terrible evening when Noridet disembarrassed himself of Monsieur Lugos, other events occurred at Paris.

Fortoto had put time to profit, and two or three reconnoissances, prudently executed in the Rue Vanneau, had made him familiar with the customs of the house. He assured himself that the alley-door was never closed before midnight, and that the courtyard was destitute of a watchman. This courtyard was used in common by the tenants of the entire establishment for the deposit of industrial products. Therein were heaped promiscuously piles of wood, paving-stones and old junk. Consequently, there could be no trouble in the selection of a hiding-place.

The day upon which the mulatto had received telegraphic order for action, he had examined the place for the last time. He ascertained the blacksmith's shop to be abandoned, and simply protected by a glazed window in bad condition. His enterprise appeared so easy of execution that he ventured upon announcing to Noridet in his telegraphic despatch his intention of accomplishing the "harvest" that very evening. Fortoto was, besides, in as great a hurry as his master for success, inasmuch as, since assuming his delicate mission, he had been compelled to completely change his habits. Not only did he abandon his two professions, but he also abstained from showing himself at Montmartre. Thus to deprive himself of the pleasure of seeing her whom he loved he justified for two reasons. In the first place he distrusted himself, and feared to be diverted from the great business; but he particularly desired to reserve the happiness of announcing his new streak of luck to Louise until after his success had been complete. He had even resolved in his mind to conceal nothing from his adored, but to relate to her all details of an incident that was the basis of his wealth. The mulatto was so convinced of Noridet's sincerity and of the legitimacy of his grievances that he doubted not his ability to remove the girl's scruples through simply telling the truth. An enterprise better adapted for a liberated felon to him appeared a work of justice, and he was convinced, in his ingenuousness, that he was about performing a good action through the burglarious recovery of papers stolen from his foster-brother. With respect to the double individuality of Louise's father he entertained not the slightest suspicion, and was far from believing the Count's intended resided elsewhere than with his master.

Upon the evening, then, of the great day he dined early and with a good appetite in Pere Pitois' kitchen, and made his way along the quays to the Rue Vanneau. He was costumed for the occasion. He had donned a blouse and cap, and assumed the appearance of a workman returning from labor. He was, too, equipped with the necessary tools—a diamond to cut the glass, a hook to draw the bolt, a cold-chisel, and a short lever to raise the anvil. This entire arsenal he carried in his belt. He carried no arms, primarily because he was not skilled in their use, and secondly because he anticipated no one with whom to fight. He would have been ashamed to assume weapons while introducing himself into an unoccupied workshop, and, moreover, in the event of unforeseen obstacles, he preferred extraction rather through cunning than through force.

Seven o'clock was striking when he entered the Rue Vanneau from the Rue de Babylon. This quarter is very animated at nightfall. Workingmen emerge from the different factories to scatter among the neighboring cabarets, while housewives circulate, homeward bound, with their marketing. There was a crowd everywhere, and Fortoto feared not being remarked. He ascended the street with an air of a lounge; yet, while walking, he glanced around with keen eyes, and when he reached the alley he was morally certain that no one was following him. He entered the house leisurely with the assured step of a man knowing where he was going, and encountered no one on the passage. The courtyard was silent and deserted. He could glide noiselessly and without effort behind a pile of boards placed against the rear wall. Chance favored him marvelously, for the shelter was sure and convenient. Through openings in this movable palisade he could see all entering the courtyard, and even cover at a glance the six stories of the house. Many windows were lighted up; children's cries could be heard and the noise of domestic utensils. This entire beehive of laborers was engaged in devouring its evening repast, and its inhabitants bestowed no thought upon the materials heaped in the courtyard. Fortoto, erect and leaning against the wall, had the smith's shop on his right. Extending his arm, he could touch the glazed window. In that direction all was quiet, and the absence of noise and of light proved conclusively that the basement was unoccupied. Nothing remained to be determined save the moment for action, and upon that point the mulatto had well-defined ideas. He had sufficiently studied the customs of the house to know that, up to nine o'clock, the staircase was in constant use by the people coming and going, and that the street-door was closed towards midnight. Between periods of activity and of closing remained three propitious hours—that is to say, six times more time than he needed to bring his work to a successful termination.

Fortoto installed himself within the sentry-box, and meditated upon the happiness consequent upon the accomplishment of his undertaking. While relating to Noridet the story of his love, he had not told him everything, but, in common with all lovers, had preserved the secret of his private hopes. He believed himself to be loved. Louise had never avowed it; still, there is a language lovers comprehend to perfection, and the mulatto had enthusiastically interpreted words spoken by the girl's eyes. On the very evening of his meeting with his foster-brother he had awaited Mademoiselle Bernard in front of the Chateau Rouge, and for the hundredth time possibly had spoken to her of marriage. Louise had amused herself by enumerating all the good qualities she exacted from her future husband. She desired him to be honest, kind and industrious; her father, in addition, required him to possess a small capital for establishing himself in business, and Fortoto was despondent at her reflection upon his inability to combine so many qualifications. Still before parting with him, the lovely girl had uttered a sentence transplanting him to the fifth heaven.

"I don't require him to be handsome, or even white," said she with a laugh, and the mulatto came near suffocating with joy.

"To-morrow I will have a dowry to bring her," thought he, counting the hours as struck upon the bell of the church in the Rue de Sevres, "and I will work and remain honest."

Fortoto blessed Jules, seeking him in his mountebank's attire to bestow upon him this happiness, and resolved to merit his gratitude.

The noises of the house gradually ceased, and the windows closed one by one. On the outside were only heard the regular tread of the city-police, and the sharp noise of shopkeepers putting up shutters. The moment had arrived. Fortoto noiselessly emerged from his hiding-place and approached the glass window. He knew the precise location of a casement closed from the inside, and selected a pane of glass whence it could be attacked. Within five minutes the glass was cut and detached with precaution. The interior bolt yielded at the first compression, and the casement opened about the height of a man. Fortoto raised himself with his hands, clambered upon the supporting wall and slipped into the workshop with the suppleness of a cat.

Darkness was profound. It was necessary to operate without noise or light, and the mulatto commenced moving around the interior with infinite precautions. He thus recognized the rear of the shop to be cut off by a wooden partition, behind which, doubtless, slept the workman when remaining at the forge. He likewise ascertained, in feeling out the lock, that the door of this recess opened in the corner towards his right.

When this exploring voyage was finished, he sought for the anvil, and found it with no great difficulty. It was high and heavy, but Fortoto possessed vigor equal to his suppleness, and, with the aid of the lever, soon moved aside this iron mass. Immediately upon its removal, he, kneeling, felt with his hands and discovered the joints of a square stone, which should cover the precious deposit. At this point the work became difficult. It was necessary to detach the cement with the cold-chisel, a delicate operation executed in the dark. More than once the tool slipped from the mulatto's hand, ringing upon the stone; but at last, by dint of patience and skill, he surmounted this final obstacle. The stone was up-lifted, and beneath his fingers Fortoto felt a box long and flat.

His emotion was so strong as to preclude prevention of a joyous exclamation. He seized the casket containing the dowry of his bride, and raised himself up triumphantly, when suddenly a ray of light blinded him. The door in the partition opened, and a female stood upon the threshold.

"Louise!" exclaimed Fortoto, trembling in surprise and astonishment.

"PA, WHAT IS ENSLAVER?" "Why—h'm—enslave, my son, is—enslave is—oh, something like mutilate, my son; something like mutilate, used to stick things together, you know. There now, run away to your play and don't disturb me now." And that boy thinks his pa is a very encyclopedia of wisdom. Happy child! Ere many years have elapsed the boy will think he knows everything and his pa nothing! Happy childhood!—Boston Transcript.

FIFTEEN-BALL POOL—FREY vs. KING.
Joe King, who a few weeks ago proposed a match at $500.00 to play Albert Frey at fifteen ball pool, and who at the same time forwarded one hundred dollars to THE CLYDE as evidence that he meant something should come of it, has been informed that the half pool match is to be played on Tuesday, Feb. 13, and was covered by Albert Frey's calling in person and depositing one hundred dollars at this office. It was understood that Frey was to manage the match, but he has refused to do so, and now says that someone who will act as permanent stakeholder, a position, he says, will not fill in an extraordinary case, and known to all.

ATHLETIC.

NEW YORK CALEDONIAN CLUB.

Great as have been the crowds annually assembling at the outdoor festivals held in this city by the New York Caledonian Club, the gatherings of several years past were discounted by the throng which attended the club's twenty-fifth anniversary on Thursday, Sept. 1. As usual, the grand annual "outing" was held at Jones Wood, Coliseum and the adjoining Schuetzen Park, as old Washington Park was been rechristened. Owing to the foliage of the trees in the open space in the Coliseum obstructing the view of the spectators, as well as to the up-and-down-hill nature of the grounds and the objections justly raised to the running-paths, the games were this year transferred from the Wood to Schuetzen Park. Here an eight-lap circuit track, with a springing path through the centre of the enclosure, had been laid at rather short notice and as, partly on account of lack of time, sufficient attention had not been bestowed upon them, these tracks were uneven and so loose that the spikes of the runners tore them to pieces, and fast time was among the impossibilities. A double row of rude seats had been put up around the track, which was protected by ropes and stakes, but as the persons occupying the rear seats persisted in standing up, the people behind them who failed to secure chairs or empty beer-kegs as a means of elevating themselves above the heads of those in front obtained but an very unsatisfactory view of the proceedings. On the north side of the grounds a flooring had been laid between the track and the fence, and those who took up positions there fared much better than those who elbowed one another and tried to see the games through the clouds of dust which enveloped all other sides of the track and was being constantly stirred up by the ever-moving feet of the restless throng. The grounds here are better adapted than those of the Coliseum for athletic sports, but next time they should be better prepared for the accommodation and comfort of the people who manifest so much interest in the competitions, and are annually pleased to swell the club's treasury. The weather was extremely warm, but fortunately the sun was obscured during the day. The management was deserving of praise for the improvement noticeable in the matter of celerity and promptitude in working off the events on the lengthy programme, as well as in keeping the inner circle freer than usual from the presence of those whose duties do not call them there, although perfection in this respect has not yet been attained. While the games were in progress the young folks, who prefer engaging in salutary exercises to looking on at athletic games, enjoyed themselves on the two large dancing-platforms which during the evening were uncomfortably filled. Below is a return of the games:

MY COLLEEN ASLEEP BY THE WATERS OF LEE.

BALLAD.

WRITTEN AND COMPOSED FOR THE NEW YORK CLIPPER.

Words by LEONARD WHEELER.

Set to Music by CHARLES CONNOLLY.

1. The sun-shine is bright on the white cliffs of Dov-er, Our sails catch the wind, and we're blown out to sea; I've a sprig of dry sham-rock, a bunch of wild clov-er, I took from her hand who was dear-est to me. She sleeps with the green, daisied grass for her cov-er, Where the riv-er flows mournful-ly down to the sea, But her mem'-ry still lives in the heart of her lov-er— My col-leen a-sleep by the wa-ters of Lee; But her mem'-ry still lives in the heart of her lov-er— My col-leen a-sleep by the wa-ters of Lee.

passionate.

2. Away to the westward our swift ship is flying, Outsailing the clouds blowing over the main; But my soul, winging back like a bird, hovers sighing O'er her grave, where my feet shall not wander again. Her cheeks were as red as the roses I cherished To blush on her bosom that yielded to me; Her eyes were as blue as the violets that perished— My colleen asleep by the waters of Lee.

3. All trembling above are the stars of the midnight, Like tears of the angels who sorrow for me; Alone in a world where there's little of sunlight, I mourn a dead maiden far over the sea. Oh! never again shall I sit by the willow, That moans on the shore I hold sacred to thee; Oh! never again shall my tears wet thy pillow— My colleen asleep by the waters of Lee.

out of her way for a codfish-ball or turkey-hash. No; her art is her all—food and drink and everything. When you see an actress begin at the top of the programme or menu and go clean to the end without missing a single number, you may be sure that the lady has been left or frozen-out somewhere. The daring brigand who has nothing better to do than to measure the holding capacity of a lady ought to be made a galley-slave. When the tanning season comes to an end there will be considerable talent thrown upon the market, and much of this talent will be soon thereafter absorbed by the variety theatre and the combination forces now working their way through the country. Some of the greatest acrobats and gymnasts in the profession will not be long in gobbling them up.

When the leaper and the tumbler and the gobbler all meet, And lay out their plans for the Fall campaign, And the comical clown shall join the jovial band, And tell the season's story o'er a glass of champagne, May we all be on hand to see it all.

This ends queer, but it's complete, and is provocative of much exhilaration, as every wine-sampler knows. Barlow, Wilson, Primrose & West's Minstrels played to fifteen thousand persons when the thermometer indicated ninety degrees and upwards in the shade. No wonder they append to their programme the good-luck line: "We have a Mascotte." When they attract such crowds, surely have they a mass caught. Adah Richmond is at liberty, and managers have now an opportunity to add a Richmond to their attractions, and, by so doing, add a Richmond in climbing to the top of the famous ladder. The Campbell are coming no more—this time it is Hague's Minstrels who are coming all the way from England, and are nearly due. They promise to give us a new version of minstrelsy, and make a revelation that may create a revolution in cork without waiting for further parliamentary action. They begin their tour of America on Monday evening next, Sept. 12, at the Arch-street Theatre, Philadelphia. When they get here, there will be revived that old conundrum: "Have you seen Sam?" Perhaps if Jennie Lee were to introduce Jo in a song-and-dance or in some funny high-kicking scene, or show him a-stand on his head, she might add fresh interest to the part, and send the audience home shouting. Sometimes a little thing like one of these will change the prospects of a play, and make a sure success out of what might otherwise only secure a verdict of "not proven." Those theatres which opened just as another bet wave struck us now admit that they were a little too previous. Wallace's new theatre might just as well be on the rocky road to Dublin as upon its present site, for the sappers and miners up at Broadway and Thirtieth street do not seem to have struck bed-rock yet. My! my! this is dreadful! The season begun, and nothing done.

And still the wonder grew That of these hidden rocks no manager nor builder knew! And there's J. W. McAndrews, who, on the strength of being a "Watermelon Man," has won fame and dollars throughout the country. To those not conversant with the facts we should say that, although Mr. McAndrews is called a watermelon man, the watermelon does not enter into any part of his composition; neither does he make watermelons, although the watermelon is sure to make Andrews. He impersonates the watermelon-vendor, and does it so naturally that whenever we see him, whether in the crowded mart of trade or upon the Rialto, we feel like going up to him, and requesting him to "plug one for us!" We thought you would like to know why he is a watermelon-man, so you will get his explanation, for this explanation, in sympathy with peaches, probably—this being an off-year—the peanut crop is less than an average one, or was, when last we heard of it, and dealers and speculators have been conspiring for a rise. This will be unpleasant news for the young fellows who choose peanuts, but chew not tobacco. More anon! These Spanish bullfighters who last year tried to popularize the sport in this city, but failed, make no promise of repeating the experiment this season. One cause of their failure here was owing to the scarcity of gore shed in the bull-ring; and when bullfighters show less of the crimson fluid than we can see in a slaughter-house for nothing, then the entertainment becomes tame and unendurable. Other bullfighters about to visit us should bear this fact in mind, just as the Wall-street bulls bear similar facts in mind. Not a performing dog has been brought up by dogcatchers this season. Many shows that greater attention should be paid to the cultivation of educated and performing canines. The guileless old lady who went to the theatre, and was shocked on being told that everything would be visible to the naked eye, has since recovered herself, and now goes it blind. Faith in "Little Ethel's Prayer" was considerably shaken by "Coney Island" at the "Union-square Theatre was inaugurated." Notwithstanding the circus now being waged in the West, we hear of but very few disasters. A "live lion loose in the streets" is no longer an every-day occurrence, nor do we hear of tigers ranging through the country at will, devouring sheep, hogs, and other beasts of prey. Neither is there such slaughter going on among lion-tamers as there used to be—perhaps the tamers are not so venturesome as formerly, or the untamable animals are more gentle and tractable, and no longer clamor for human gore! Laughing hyenas continue in exuberant spirits, and leopards and other ferocious creatures are more civilized, and commit fewer depredations. Altogether, the circus and the menagerie are more refined than they were in the long-ago, when the sight of a rare beefsteak would set men and animals alike wild with expectation. Much of this change for the better is probably due to the new police in the world, and to the kind forbearance of candy-buffets and other privileged gentlemen connected with the show. Many people who may take in "Jo," at Haverly's Fourteenth-street Theatre, will probably declare that this sad and sorrowful little street-crossing sweeper is a real live boy. That's where such people will be led astray, as we happen to know that the sweeper is a bona-fide girl, and the little girl Lee, who was brought here by H. J. Sargent, who seems to have quite an interest in this young thing, and who is coaching her in her efforts to earn an honest living in the theatre, instead of permitting her to go through the streets of New York in such a humble capacity, when she can do much better work as an actress. We make this announcement to prevent any misunderstanding at the outset of Miss Jennie Lee's return to this country. Words of

WELCOME.

O Jennie Lee, sweet Jennie Lee, We welcome you from o'er the sea! Some people who wanted to own a share in "Michael Strogoff" are less anxious now that "Michael" has been seen, and those who got in on the ground-floor would like to be let out, so to speak. When we read on the bills of the Bijou Opera-house "Rooms for Rent," we inwardly exclaimed: "Better than the Opera-house for rent." The opening of the regular season at Daly's Theatre on the 7th will introduce to our notice the new play of "Quits." Now, if it should succeed in doubling the attendance at this house, then it would be a clear case for "Double and Quits." When "Quits" quits, may the manager remain to count his gain. [We meant to have made something better out of this; but, after turning it over and over, and twisting it in and out, and using the pruning-knife until there was little or nothing left of the original composition, we confess to a partial failure to make it bring down the house, though we wish to bring down the house in something we cannot understand, and we will call it "Quits" and quit.] When Circus comes to town this week, and Mr. Coup and his troupe will enter Madison-square Garden to-night like an army with banners and horses. The small boy will save himself some trouble if he will call to mind the fact that there is no canvas for him to crawl under at this garden, and he had better bring his half-dollar with him, instead of coming empty-handed and trying to shut up the doorkeeper's eyes. Big show, this of Coup's and a grand array of performers, lighted up by a grander ray of electric illuminations. It is well enough for the nautical actor to cry out in the play "Heave ahead!" But then comes the problem as to whose head is to be heaved, and it will behoove the other actors to find this out before signing articles. The shows down at Coney Island are beginning to pull up stakes or are taking a rest in their canvas. Some of them have done right well, and all of them would have done much better had it not been for the almost universal love of clams, which rule the roast at that resort, where, infants even, clamor for more clams.

CITY SUMMARY.

OPENING OF BOOTH'S THEATRE.—"Michael Strogoff" was produced Wednesday night, Aug. 31, having been postponed from Aug. 29, the reason assigned being "the present condition of the President." With this performance the regular season of this theatre, under the management of John Stetson, began in the presence of an audience which filled the auditorium in every part. Some little delay and confusion was caused during the entire representation of the prologue in seating the spectators, because some of the ushers had not become sufficiently familiar with the theatre. The cast was: Michael Strogoff (of the Imperial Messengers), F. C. Bangs; Ivan Ogareff (a disgraced Russian officer), J. Newton; Goethold; Governor of Moscow, A. D. Billings; General Klesoff; John Swinburne; Richard Hunt (New York correspondent), Leodore Davidson; John Phillip (London correspondent), Felix Morris; Feofar (Emir of Bokhara), George Robinson; Chief of Police, Delancey Barclay; An innkeeper, George Bowden; Passport-agent, Charles Torrance; Telegraph-clerk, T. P. Atkins; Tartar Chief, Z. Tallar; Aide-de-camp to Governor of Moscow, Walter Eyring; High Priest, W. H. Pope; Officer, George Copin; First Traveler, Harry

T. C. D. Mobile.—I. You can get such a cut of Roylance & Co., 90 Centre street, this city, who did the one you cite as a sample. It will cost you about ten dollars. 2. You ought to be able to get an engagement, were you to advertise your capacity. 3. If any minstrel publisher has offered you thirty dollars for a ballad, don't for a moment neglect to take it. The ballad may be worth more, but you stand a chance of growing gray waiting for its sales to prove that it is ten dollars is a fair price for a ballad with original words and original music.

F. A. F. San Francisco.—I. We should advise you to abandon the idea of becoming a theatrical manager. Your being "a good piano and cornet player and possessing a good idea of music, German, French and bookkeeping" would be of but scant service to you in any managerial capacity. 2. H. L. D. Trenton.—I. Ladies can be taught to ride in the circus by applying to the riding-school of James Cooke, Newtown, L. I. 2. It would scarcely be possible for the average female "to learn to ride inside of three months." It would depend upon the style of riding the pupil aimed at, however.

R. E. N.—We should advise you to apply to Harry Kennedy, ventriloquist, Brooklyn, N. Y. You can easily get his address by looking in the Brooklyn directory for that of Will H. Kennedy, music-publisher.

M. D. Harrisburg.—It is our positive rule not to answer by mail. As you say yourself, the whereabouts of that and other traveling companies are generally to be found in our amusement columns, and to the latter we must respectfully refer you.

FRANK, Wilmington.—I. George Wilson of Barlow, Wilson, Primrose & West's Minstrels made his first public appearance in 1869. 2. Wilson is not professionally a banjo player. 2. See answer to "Frank, Wilmington."

INTRODUCTORY.

TUESDAY, Sept. 6, '81.

Thus early in the season things theatrical in this city do not move along so smoothly and so uninterruptedly as had been anticipated, notwithstanding injunctions and rumors of suits at law, and all those alleged bitterness and probable hostilities among managers and authors and people, which are supposed to be calculated to arouse public attention and create an excitement, culminating in filling the infected theatres from the cellar to the garret. What is the matter, anyhow? There was Manager Collier's "Coney Island" play, which opened a preliminary season at the Union-square Theatre, and which was pitched into most unmercifully by the critics, and in a way, too, which Mr. Collier must have despised. What was the result? "Coney Island" backed water, and its run terminated abruptly. That was case No. 1. Following this came Samuel Colville's next of kin, "Michael Strogoff," which commenced Manager Stetson's reign at Booth's Theatre. There had been a good deal of talk about this spectacle, and what with the claims of this one and that one, and the seemingly beligerent attitude of many parties interested in one as well as in the welfare of "Michael," looked we all for a big thing on Russian ice. No wonder there were a jam and a jam-boree at Booth's Theatre on the opening night, and it was not surprising that, before the be-him, and there is an exciting scene, in which the Major strives to have Frank given in charge of the trick of a merry Irishman, Larry O'Pheysay, who isleads the policeman sent for to arrest Frank, on the time until the vessel sails, and the splendid realization of the dramatic diery march up the dock with the crowds of sailors and on board the huge ship, and "in the band strikes up "Auld Lang Syne" the huge ship moves slowly round and sails gliding out of the dock with the regiment on board, flags flying, women waving handkerchiefs, and men shouting farewell to the gallant warriors. But a scene of another kind had taken place, and the band playing the strains of "The Soldier's March" no longer mention his name lest the savage Major should still insist upon his arrest; yet they give him their blessings and best wishes, and upon this really affecting and well-managed scene the curtain falls amidst deafening applause. The seventh tableau is entirely taken up with military matters, and, very exciting they are; for to give the most complete responsibility to this scene, the undersigned, the Victoria Company and Sir William Armstrong have supplied real Gatling guns and other modern implements of warfare, and the thunders of real cannon are added to the mimic horrors of the mimic fight, called here the defense of Hawk's Point. This was supposed to indicate the defense of Rorke's Drift, but when in the melee we see the foe aloft in Afghan, and not in garb of the Boers, the undersigned, who has so judiciously conducted himself in the most heroic manner, and so ultimately learn, gains the Victoria Cross for his valor. Gardner leaps in this manner no less than eleven of the huge beasts.—BOSTON POST, June 7.

The horsemanship of the celebrated Frank Gardner is a matter of national renown. He is one of the most skillful bareback riders and leapers in the world, and is famous in nearly every state in the Union. His jockey-act is a fine exhibition of confidence and agility.—THE NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, April 26.
The ground and lofty tumbling of a corps of trained athletes was somewhat amusing, as it demonstrated that an intense rivalry existed among them. The most startling act in this line was the leap of Prof. Gardner over the backs of eight elephants.—BROOKLYN UNION AND ARGUS, May 10. 25-11

By Mr. F. A. Gardner and the numerous corps of splendidly-formed male athletes most astonishing gymnastic feats were performed. The hazardous somersault executed over a pyramid of some of the largest elephants in the world is a feat which requires all similar efforts ever before witnessed.—BOSTON DAILY GLOBE, June 9.
One of the most exciting incidents of the entertainment is the leaping contest, in which something like a score of athletes turn double somersaults over a pyramid of elephants, and Mr. Frank

THE "ORIGINAL WATERMELON MAN."

J. W. McANDREWS

just closed a brilliant engagement of

SIXTY-SEVEN WEEKS

WITH HAVERLY'S ORIGINAL MASTODON MINSTRELS.

A TREMENDOUS HIT AT

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE, LONDON, ENGLAND.

ADDRESS CARE OF CLIPPER.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.
JACK HAVERLY.—I was asked the other day who I thought was the most pushing, go-ahead and indefatigable manager now prominently before the public, and I unhesitatingly said Colonel Jack McAndrews. I remembered how last year, in London, the walls of that ancient city were covered all over with his mammoth posters and illuminated pictures and heads of himself and the Mastodon Minstrels; how boys and girls, lords and commons, ancient ladies and youthful maidens thronged Her Majesty's Theatre to listen to his wonderful troupe, and laugh at the clever impersonations of that marvellous old watermelon dandy, McAndrews.—SAN FRANCISCO POST.

McAndrews repeated his "Watermelon Man." This impersonation is a most perfect counterpart of scenes daily witnessed during the Summer season upon the streets of Richmond, Virginia. The sable Jesus from Hanover and Henrico Counties have evidently been his study. The character is entirely new; every motion, look and utterance is drawn from the manner of "country niggers in town, who have dar' han's full." Pleasure, business and an eye on "dat mull," with the feeling that no town nigger in "Enclose a wuf a chaw of tobacco, can't be trusted now, and shan't hab de las' word."

The most life-like scenes of Cuffy at home to be found in any negro-minstrel troupe is portrayed by this gentleman, who has got things down "fuser den a pin-point, and can't be beat dis side of North Carolina." The only opportunity of seeing an old-time negro as he was before the war is found with Mr. McAndrews.—EUREKA TIMES. [11 minstrel company ever had in Boston; but hear them laugh! I never heard anything like it!"

TWO YOUNG, BUT HEALTHY NOTICES,
NOT DOCTORED OR ALTERED, BUT JUST AS ORIGINALLY PRINTED:

BOSTON THEATRE.—LEAVITT'S MINSTRELS.—Leavitt's Gigan-tean Minstrels delighted another large audience at the Boston Theatre last evening, with their excellent vocalism and numerous special novelties. This company has made one of the most decided hits scored in Boston for a long time, and deserves the immediate success it has gained, for it has achieved something long regarded as impossible—it presents something really novel and entertaining in minstrelsy.—BOSTON HERALD, Aug. 30.
BOSTON THEATRE.—Leavitt's splendid minstrel combination

THE ADVERTISER SAYS: "For the first time in its history minstrelsy presents VOCAL
AND INSTRUMENTAL EFFECTS EQUALLY AS STRONG AS GRAND OPERA." 25-11

AN EVENT IN MINSTRELSY.

VISIT OF THE FIRST BRITISH MINSTREL TROUPE TO THIS COUNTRY.

SAM HAGUE'S MINSTRELS,

THE ORIGINAL GEORGIA MINSTRELS, FROM ST. JAMES' HALL, LIVERPOOL, ENGLAND, THE REPRESENTATIVE COMPANY OF THE BRITISH ISLES.

Sam Hague comes to this country with a fifteen years' reputation from the other side of the water, a reputation honestly earned and firmly endorsed by every lover of music and rational amusement. Whether he be prince or peasant, Sam Hague, in introducing an English minstrel entertainment to the VERY HOME where minstrelsy originated, and where only true illustrations of negro character can possibly emanate from, wishes it to be distinctly understood that his entertainment in no way clashes with any other minstrel troupe, past or present. Sam Hague's object has been to progress with the times and to call a high-class music and art, which at this moment is paramount in England. He has succeeded in engaging the very best artists obtainable, musically and vocally, selected from the principal cathedrals, operatic, sacred, harmonic and glee union societies in the country, who unite to present

AN ENSEMBLE EQUAL TO ANY HIGH-CLASS BALLAD CONCERT IN THE WORLD.

The Company thus specially organized consists entirely of English, Irish, Scotch and Welsh men, who have made their mark in the various branches of the musical profession.

THE ENGLISH ROSE, THE IRISH SHAMROCK, THE WELSH LILLY AND THE SCOTCH THISTLE

harmoniously blended and firmly united. Mr. Hague wishes it to be further understood that, although so much time, labor and expense has been expended on the first part of the entertainment, the second or variety part has been equally considered, and only well known and popular British artists have been engaged.

Special and distinct artists are engaged for each part of the programme, and no subordinates appear on the stage.

Hague's Minstrels leave Liverpool August 27, per S. S. Abyssinia (Union Line).

Hague's Minstrels make their first appearance in America at Arch-street Theatre, Philadelphia, Monday, Sept. 12, 1881.
